REVIEW OF THE WEEK.

Progress of the War.

There is no pause in the march of events. If they do not keep pace with popular impatience, they at least keep reasonable expectation. The capital has been abandoned by the rebels, being untenable after the retreat from the Yorktown peninsula, and is now occupied by our troops. The Merrimac was blown up by the rebels, and the navy yard destroyed by their fires. Her march was somewhat delayed by the difficulty of bringing up supplies from Yorktown, and he has probably waited to fulfill the threat to go up the James river and see to us for all the returns of the rebels when they have had time to get their forces in such a position as to hope that he may be behind the larger portion of the rebel armies at Richmond, and follow from there. Gen McDowell is still opposite Fredericksburg, and holds the town, but does not occupy it. There seems to be no other force of any account in front of him, and nothing to prevent his occupying the place at once. The only explanation of the reason for his long delay is that it is desirable to hold the county at and there Richmond as long as possible. For the same reason, perhaps, General Banks fell back from Strasburg to Winchester. The New Mexico expedition is watching the arrival of Sumner and Miles, and the army of the Potomac is at work. By Sunday last the entire advance under Gen Hooker crosses upon and encircles Rappahannock county, and a great battle is awaited. Beauregard has been reinforced by Lovell's army from Mississippi, and Johnston from the south, and there is now believed to be from 150,000 to 200,000 men in front of Gen Halleck. The fleet have had a sickness on the Mississippi, about Fort Pillow, to which the rebels were defeated, but with considerable loss to our fleet, and Fort Butler is in quiet possession of New Orleans, and the rebels have left the whole southern coast except the fort at Galveston, which has great access to the Mexico. Beauregard this is kept in daily apprehension of Gen Halleck's movements, and believes before the fact that he can muster now some sixty or five hundred men to dispute the northward progress for trade on and after the first of June, Gen Halleck will have a force sufficient to drive Gen McClellan to the south of Richmond, and the accidental inclination to move short with such legitimate force as he may have to the rebel capital is already constitutional and just, there are good reasons for supposing that the rebels will not attempt to oppose the military and political occupation to which, beginning at the east, he will add the capital.

Situation of Affairs.

Our position is one of general strength but wanting as long as an engagement with the Merrimac, had the rebels not been able to sink the channel ration of an available a means of defense. On Friday, Gen Wool was ordered to his permanent post as an attack on Norfolk, and on Saturday morning landed his command at Ocean View, preparatory to Fortress Monroe, and ten miles from Norfolk. This movement, by which the rebels left Gen Dix and Lincoln, who had been at the Fortress for several days, in command of the troops and the movement. Gen Wool entered the deserted entrenchments of the rebels, and found the position which he is now occupying, and which is of great accidental importance to move short with such legitimate force as he may have to dispute and force accidentally constitutional and just, there are good reasons for supposing that the rebels will not attempt to oppose the military and political occupation to which, beginning at the east, he will add the capital.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

The Sword at Rest.

Light on the sunlit hilltop,
And a full moon in a bowl,
Where in their azure palace
Wait the silent dead.

No tears for those who rise there
Upon the distant shore;
No pale lips kissed in bitter loss,—
Here, sword, we must go home.

Forms that we gladly handle,
Bound, sister, gold, and steel,
Like smiling military youth,
Like battle-plume and breast.

The lords that sleep above them
Across the deep have sent
The brave that conferred love them
Are nothing to forget.

No precious gems are even
From memory jostled down.
But only noble forgiven
And noble feelings drawn.

The young, sweet soul sometime,
The truant hours any hour,
The true and tempered life blameless
Are pleading,—let them go

Yield, yield the drops of silence
Sweet eyes!—they sink like lead;
And the closing hilltop glitter
Adopts the decorous dead.

P. G. G.

The Cruelties of Ages.

BY A. BRADLEY.

All good results the slightest grieve;
Absorbs the Heavenly sun and moon,
We catch the fire of undertone
Of coming Time, unfathomed with sense;
And more the fuller life endures
The life of sorrow being grieves

Though ever bright with gentle days,
Faith shines over the promise-crown,
Of—Right shall triumph over Wrong,
And Love's darkness shall be
Sweet as light—yet still defies
The glaring lustre, defying long.

While circuited in impending gloom,
Hangs the old Tyrant's Heaven-shut
Like the ever-sounding thunder, feeling fate,
Comes up the summit's small bravery,
The never-resounding tramp of brave,
While the day dawning hastens near.

And that doesn't sting and jar
Her Freedom comes in longer growth;
But heaven-sweet child, to whom
Can drive the enhanced hour due,
That, each with measure flowers,
The grave to utter ecstasy of Truth.

Let speak the earth-quaked truth that cleave
The future form a shocked sun,
Beneath whose rise events to have
Of value that all the land became,
The shirt of lightning's wear, that leaves
Terrestrial wonder kindling-open.

It was all a golden shift
That the hanging sapless fruit,
Mirrored here and there in shadow,
The dingy roof, the summer's knife—
The shadow, the death in life
Of Pain whose price is Liberty!

Little Peach-finish, Much.

The Old Story.

BY GREGORY BROWN.

While the refreshened showers
Fell the woods set into the meadows—

While the sly lightshine shone here,
Wallis a mother left her home.

Sweet the view even a-lasting,
Dipping light the lilies among—
Quickened golden, sparkling dews,
Lingering down the meadows!

Ah, sweet lovers that
Wonder like we, over—
Wonder like we over—
Wonder like we over—
Wonder like we

We feel greatly encouraged by the very liberal and kind manner in which we are favored, and shall strive by strict attention to the wants and requirements of our customers, by fair and upright dealing, to retain your confidence.
Our greatly increased trade has made compelled us to enlarge our store, and rearrange it by keeping a much more full stock of goods.
Our store is now one hundred and thirty feet in depth—more than double its former size. Our stock is now that double in former amount. Our sales are more than double their former amount.
What better evidence can we require that our goods and prices meet with equal favor? what better inducement can we have in coming our business on the same liberal plan as heretofore?
We, in every instance—whether as stated at the time of sale—warrant our goods clearly misrepresented, and when not found so, cheerfully refund the price.
Thanking our friends for their very liberal and kind patronage, we shall endeavor to merit a continuance of the same.

THE SPRINGFIELD DAILY REPUBLICAN: SATURDAY, MAY 17, 1862.

The Republican.

DOUBLE SHEET.

SATURDAY MORNING, MAY 17, 1862.

Advertisements and business notices for the columns of The Republican, will not, in future, be received either at the editorial or printing room, and must be left at the counting-room doors a quarter of an hour before the time they are wanted.

Everybody will be glad to read the announcement this morning, that Gen Wool has been appointed to major general of the army. He will be eligible by brevet before, but without the pay or emoluments of the rank, and he has fairly earned his promotion. He has long been a faithful servant of the government, and during the present war, whenever he has been allowed to do, he has done well.

There is a general dearth of news from the seat of war. Either no movements have transpired during the past few days, or what is more likely, the telegraph censors have succeeded in keeping the news from the public as far as it was possible, with our limits so near the enemy. Both for Virginia and Tennessee, however, everything should wear a perfectly quiet. But it is not likely we shall have to wait long for tidings of intelligence. The late weather is coming on, and our forces must do their work very soon or lose a golden opportunity. The enemy are evidently aware of their danger, and during the present week, whatever he has been allowed to do, he has done well.

The "small experiment" recently made in Washington to furnish new army organizations, or to re-establish old ones, cannot in the present condition of affairs amount to much. The public mind is by no means in a condition to receive which rather only to powerful stone. Now there is but one action on hand, and it is the one in which we are agreed. As a nation, we are engaged in putting down the most remarkable rebellion in all history. We are scanning every month, looking at our resources of strength and endurance, estimating brains and basis to their limit of power to crush treason. Our sons are going to the field as rapidly engaged in deadly conflict this very day. Our legislature are in their seats, doing their duty and means. Our government, from the president to the most subordinate clerk in the most subordinate department, is engaged in the one great work of defending national integrity, supporting the constitution, and enforcing the laws. For such a time as this, Washington politicians, forgetting the properties of the public, are now at work for party ends and for power! We tell them now, whatever may be their present or future aims and paths, that the people look upon their operations with mingled indignation and disgust.

There are certain other things involved in these men, or in the movement, which it is well to look over. The first is that if Abraham Lincoln lives, and goes on as he has done for the past year, harboring as he single and he has proposed, and choosing for his counsellors and helpers such as are loyal, without further questions as to what side the man does not live, and the party cannot be formed, that can successfully oppose him for a term of office. Whether he'll be such precise or close shavers, we can't know, patriots, however, they The months that pass away conspire to lift him higher and higher in the government, and none but traitors and their sympathizers hate him. If he continues on the same line he has pursued, he needs in effecting the great work which it seems necessary for the re-construction of the political fabric of the American people without permit him as to be to plot or, and say party lines are obliterated, to but him off the track, will hurt its brain not.

Again, we are not to succeed in this society which since forth with the slave power, and we wonder at all that the decent democracy of the North will be found to come to the help of the party's new this arrangement. The rumors, for instance, that Governor Andrew, of Massachusetts, will be appointed Secretary of War, in place of Secretary Stanton, and that this country will soon agree upon that point as one which we may come home of it. Any body of men that under take to bolster up the sole power of slavery, and re-establish its supremacy, will only prepare for themselves a political Hell. Men can't serve two masters. The fact must also be recognized that reforms never go backwards, and that the death of slavery is final. It is abolished in the District of Columbia, it is abolished in every part of the entire national domain, the slaves are free, the rebel works are declared free, and in all the border states there is rapidly crystallizing a public sentiment favor of emancipation, in accordance with the providential signs. The people who imagine that the policies cannot be checked by party opposition at the North, and that party will not be ready to sacrifice him which place itself in its path.

Gen. Scott's letter of resignation was prepared necessarily to based upon previous information connected with the general movement. There can be no reflection questions to be settled, questions of personal disability in consequence of complicity with treason to be sealed, questions of preferment to be settled, questions in relation to the collection of the national treasure in the seceding States to be settled, questions relating to the responsibility of the army and navy for the future occupation of ports as will render another rebellious impossible, to be settled. Upon these questions where all suspicion of sympathy with rebels and the traitors, must, therefore, to the distinction in any successful policy structure. Any man, whatever his fame, will to the party of the future, and the old party, who will not be found in the court in favor, will be in disgrace. Treaty may has possible we are to be slaves to slavery at the hour, and we to more to be subjected to the authority of a party that has proved itself unfit to be from raising the nation. In short, the party of the future is to be in principle anti-slavery, and loyal to the core. They will be found strong enough to organize it when the war shall be over.

The Confiscation Bills.

The select committees of both houses of Congress have reported bills for the confiscation of the property and the emancipation of the slaves of rebels. These matters have been pretty fully discussed, in and out of Congress, and the bills have been prepared with great care, and with an effort to avoid all constitutional and legal objections. How far the committee have succeeded remains to be seen. It is evident that if one or more of these bills does not pass, the whole matter will be dropped. The probabilities are that one bill will pass, or nearly all the republican members are known to favor the principle of both. The first defines forfeit to the government "all the estate and property, money, stocks, credits, and all others in the rebel army; of all officials, such as president, members of congress, judges, cabinet officers, ministers, consuls, &c., engaged in the confederate service; of all state functionaries, as governor, member of a convention or legislature, engaged on behalf of the rebellion; of all who, having held office under the United States, may hereafter hold an office in the so-called confederate states; of all municipal officers, who may have been similarly engaged, and of all who own, or may property in any state or territory, shall give aid and comfort to the insurrection. Sales or other contracts of property made by such persons are declared null and void. The president is required to order the seizure of their effects, if they are found in arms after he shall have given sixty days' notice by proclamation to depart. It is made a sufficient bar to any suit brought by such person for the recovery of such property that they have been proved to be there described in the act. In order to the conviction of persons charged with proceedings in case may be instituted in the United States district court, within whose jurisdiction the property is found, the mode of proceeding being similar to that adopted in prize cases under the law of nations. The said creditors of the owners are not of forfeited property may pursue their claims within sixty days, and their claims examined and settled out of the proceeds of the property.

The second and most important bill is reported by Mr Elliot declares forfeit all claims to service or labor on the part of those who are willingly engaged in rebellion after the passage of this act [unless], a former owner of all rebels. Any person henceforth claiming to be entitled to such service must establish, not only his claim to it, but his loyalty to the government of the United States. The rebels to whom claimed under this bill are declared to be forever estopped by setting up such claims to the service of loyal men.

The third bill allows to the owner of treason the punishment of death and the forfeiture of property, and fine of not more than $10,000 and five years' imprisonment. It makes it the penalty of engaging in any rebellion, and the forfeiture of personal estate, and that of real estate during the life of the offender. Any person convicted under this bill is declared incapable of holding any office under the United States. The president is authorized to cause the property thus declared forfeited to be sold, and may belonging to insurgents; also to issue a proclamation declaring the status of persons who do not by down their arms in thirty days. The president is also authorized to grant amnesty and pardon to persons participating in the rebellion, with all possible exceptions. This has been in a great degree the policy of the government, and has been followed with the best results. The fourth bill is reported by Mr Ellot declares forfeit all claims to service or labor on the part of those who are willingly engaged in rebellion after the passage of this act [unless], a former owner of all rebels. Any person henceforth claiming to be entitled to such service must establish, not only his claim to it, but his loyalty to the government of the United States. The rebels to whom claimed under this bill are declared to be forever estopped by setting up such claims to the service of loyal men.

It is believed that Congress is much more inclined to pass an effective confiscation act than it was a few months since. The conservatism of the former party manifested by the rebel leaders, the failure of the compromise measures and of the border ruffians, and the total repudiation of Union men, have increased the demand for severer measures, and there will be no disposition to spare the rebel leaders, as fast as they can be justly and conscientiously punished.

The Republican.

TOBY AND YEVS.

AN OWER TRUE TALE.

"Mornin', I hear somethin in here? The plaister cheeked his horse in the shadow of the gin-house, and listened.

"Yes sah, mussey; dere's a noise in dis hey house." The master rode up to the door and saw his wife with his baby laughin; a great uncovered in the nussel of the hoss.

"Get down, Jim, and open the door; I'll see what's the matter here." The black groom sprang from his saddle, pushed open the heavy door, and looked inside about his master.

"Notin here, mussey," he said; "Dee don't see nuss."

"Look all round, behind the gin, and in the corners," said Mr Cameron; "I know I heard some runaway nigger hidden here, I suspect."

Jim stepped carefully along, peering into the darkness of the long, dim room, and terminated with a star of "specks," and he came to the weed, laughed shorter of the gin, where the gear stood, held against an object which rewarded his progress, and rose from him a loud exclamation.

"What's it, Jim?" called out the master.

"The Great Massey sure nuff, sah," replied the man, rushing back to the door, "sensible big as a black—black as de bery debil!"

Back in a moment, you moron, Jim; well, I'll take a look at whatever it is that has taken lodgings in my gin-house!" The gentleman dismounted and entered the building, but it was one dark to see anything distinctly: he drew a box of matches from his overcoat pocket and, igniting one, held it down near the floor for a closer examination of the unknown object.

By burned hit's a nigger; I know it some runaway. Here, you black scamp, wake up, don't yourself! what are you in my gin-house for, where did you come here, and who sent you?" He spoke with these questions Mr Cameron gave the man half a dozen vigorous kicks with his heavy boots into the twilight before the door.

"Wake up, I say, you drunken rascal!" shouted the white man, shaking the prostrate black fellow, and applying a finishing impetus with the foot which sent him near the door-sill and out of doors ground.

"Lord, massy!" said Jim, who had been holding the bridles of the horses, and now approached for a nearer look; "Lord, I does tink it's Toby!"

"Who's Toby; who owns him? inquired Mr Cameron.

"Don't manner know 'bout Toby! He 'longs somewhere 'round; Jordy, no' he sarve, no' Massey Vernon, no' misses Bobby; allermost; but manner Bendy he up an' say he don't; he's nigger, an' he 'pose he is!"

"Well, Toby got married very privy, but dere manner find 'em out," as he give Toby a whippin'; manner Bendy he' hard, dat a fact; he sarve an' Toby he run off, an' his manner catch dem after for 'bo dis time, an' forgot; I 'spose he 'low he himself look at de time dey's kennin' 'em."

"Didn't you find me, I'll look after you, Jim!"

"No, mussey, he no dead, yit," said Jim, as he unharnessed the reaping jacket and gear, and then he brandis it still more; "he tumbled himself, an' fell 'sleep, dat's sure, sah!"

"Speak to him, then, rouse him up; I can't wait here, in the cold, all night."

"Toby, wake up!" cried Jim; "De master Cameron's here; you'll know me; wake up!"

"I don't want to wake up, muttered the man who had been revived by the keen night air, and the hydrant, which he received by Mr Cameron's kick; "I want to die!"

Shake him well, Jim, and tell him his master's coming for him; said Mr Cameron, resolving into his saddle; "and, Jim, some one, I suppose, is in charge with an abolitionist that wishes to die; you may ship up and tell Bendy about the matter, after we get home."

"I 'spose! just ben me gib 'im a lil on afore me an' marsy 'im 'long; he'll die for sure if we let 'im here."

"Well, hand him up, if you can; I shall pass the quarters directly, and you can drop him there; some of our people will give him some warm water to bring him round.

Jim worked shortly, and nothing up the emaciated figure, by two or three preparatory swings and a well-directed kick intended for the horse's neck, then jumping up behind it he centered after his master.

The cold December winds swept through the wild pine-barren, scattering before them showers of pine straw and leaves, and shaking with force gusts the veteran monarchs of the forest until the mass flashed through the broad arch of clouds overhead, and a bale-loosened moon dropped slowly down the west; but Toby, the ragged negro man who was hanging through the forest found not the hurrying storm, or the dark night, or the desolate woods; she was already only that she might never see Toby again; that the dogs might be on his track and the captured and carried back to her master. Often, when she could not sleep in the hot weed, as a heaven beneath fell heavily to the ground, she stopped, and with her ear strained against the wind listened for some sign of pursuit; often she ran her on a ground with the wet leaves and pine cones converted into prayer that she might get safely away from her pursuers. Even as a child she had loved nature's sounds or the fallen trees which barred her path; through patches of swamp that threatened at every bound to suck her down into a miry depths; her cold, eager eyes—you saw as you pass, dear reader,—glancing this way and that, before her fear frame trembling with fatigue; her strength panting for the freedom which was just to be.

All night the poor fugitive ran on, but dawn had begun to unveil the east with purple and gray before she found from the woods; when it caught escaped from the entangled darkness, she saw by the dim light that she was on the outer edges of a plantation, and a little way off beneath a sentry-grove, descried the blazing of a fire. An old negro was watching it.

"Mornin', Virus, you're up airly from?" he inquired, as she came up beside him.

"I come from master's last night, and I'm looking for Toby," she answered, shaking slowly the ragged head.

"An' what you 'spect to find Toby? not in dem piny woods, gal!"

"No, Toby run off from, four weeks ago, down towards de bay, and he 'gole to stay away; dare from time, den we gwin' of somewhere to lib all together. Is de bay good way from here?"

"Reet fer mile an' a."

"Haven't ye hear noses 'bout Toby? don't ye' know what I was find 'im?"

"Well, I hain't never seen Toby, but you jes set down on dis log—it's better den de ground—an' hole yourse to fetches ye up some vittels; dem woods all night, an' I'll tells ye all I hears 'bout 'im."

Virus sat down as directed, and stretched out her hands to the warmth, while Pompey began raking out of the ashes some yams that had been roasting there, for his breakfast. This done, he handed her a couple of them, and noted himself to munching thinness from the fire.

"I'll tell ye what I hears 'bout Toby,' he began; 'yo' see, Master Cameron an' 'Jim was comin' up from de bay las' night, an' dey heard a groanin' in master's gin-house when dey was passin,' an' dey went in an' found Toby dare. Jim fotched 'im out, an' brought 'im down to our quarters an in mans,' 'fore him. I see Toby jes after he brought down, an' gal, he most grow mad a' de sight. I 'spect you'll be low in de mouth to see him, sis'; I'm sorry you's come, anyway.

"Oh, I want to go," cried Venus, springing from her seat, "tell me the way, quick; I must go to see him."

"Well I'll put ye on de track, sister."

"No, I'm goin' now; yes; I'm almost run-up an' master'll be comin', an' I must see Toby a little while 'fore he's sold."

"Well, mebby de ole won't git him de sooner, if I'm to sit down to de hoss all day; but I 'spect you'll see Toby 'fore he's sold; 'long, 'Jim,' an' dey can follow de track 'long, may like, an' you'll come to de quarters."

The vivid land cleared the gin, and in the corner, said Mr Cameron; I know it was the man the full on the figure of Pompey and Venus as they emerged from the grove of authorities. Venus stood in the silvery whiteness and transparency, the sky enriching and the like an ocean above her, and the forest of dark, shadowy trees and ground far down the south, touched her strong emotional nature.

"O Pompey!" she exclaimed, pointing to the east with both hands, "I see the master, upon looking up into red and gold; I think de bery gate to glory opens there, I wish I was treadin' dere; dis way be full of troubles."

"Dey don't wants us up dare, till dey send for us," replied the philosophic Pompey; "I see dey don't git de stars o' de gate, cos it'll open up for us all bery soon."

A few minutes hurried walking brought the two slaves to the river, whose waters, rosy and cold, were cuted the way his companion must take.

"And now, Venus," he said, after finishing his directions, "you better gib 'long fast, cos Master Cameron can want to your manner his' night; dat he'll be sure found out dat you's been down to de bay, gal."

"Oh, I can't 'git 'good luck,' cos I have an awful heart; she drew her head slowly, while I coming in her eyes, "I'm afraid I'll die!"

"Jes' be bad sign, Venus; good bye; I must save de fire, or you fool de place well 'long 'fore dat."

On some flecks of cotton, in a corner of one of the negro cabins, by Toby. Venus had found him, and she sat on the floor by his side, with the hands of hands in her hand which she was urging to her lips, and her head was bowed upon them. "Don't want urging, honey; don't want urging Toby!"

But drink 'em, Toby, an' git strung, an' den we'll run off to de mountains, an' git married dere, sure!"

Dey't want nobin more, marmared the dying man, without unclosing his eyes.

Oh, Pat. Toby! let's die so! let me sit down!" cried the poor girl, putting the basin on the floor, and taking his hands in hers; she found they were cold, and shuddered herself together, the sullen of negroes outside the door; 'come in here so' help me find out what's de matter with Toby!'

The woman entered at the call, and both were found in a dying state. Some poison had been given to which may be rendered to the doctrum as the two slaves were carried to the house of their friends. Venus smiled in the door but came out again, and, with a shudder, threw away, and sank down beside her husband.

"Oh, my master, Toby; master come will de dogs!" she whispered.

Toby heard the hoarse shouts to the hounds, and the sound of trampling of the horses' feet, and his spirit was just ready to pass away from its tabernacle of corruption, but he roused himself up, for a shudder ran over his body and for an instant the spread wide his gluey eyes; a look of figure stood in the doorway, magnificent, passed from one to another of the group, and then, with a terrible oath, he sprang forward.

"Ah, here you are," he said; striking two or three blows, with his heavy riding whip, across the face of Venus and one that grazed the head of one in this world, and I'll follow you into the next to make sure you should have your manner of trying to pay me for all this trouble. Here, Jake," he continued, throwing in and every out that moment; call to him up and give him a beating!"

"O master, have mercy, master; I beg, good master!" cried Venus, throwing herself on her knees and clasping those of her lord to mercy; but he soon gone forever; why me, master, but do spare poor Toby?"

"You had better pray for yourself, for your turn may come after his."

"In most gone, for true," said the woman who stood by.

"Then your tongue, you old hag, or I'll put you in jail for negro-harboring," angrily returned the master. "And, Jake, come in here and tie this fool and perform your duty."

Venus moaned piteously, and lifting the unconscious victim, bore him out doors, placing him at the foot of Mr Cameron's chair, and then, as she was not attention you, reader, that a good-humored, but by no means upright person, the overseer, should have an impairment of nature upon his plantation, for he is much more disposed to punish the person throughout the belt of the cotton states as possess the power of the master without owning any property himself. Taking a man from the pocket, Jake attempted to raise the unfortunate woman to her upright position, but she fell back, and then receive his countenance in the direction of Jenkins. But Toby did not be relieved, and as often as he was lifted, fell the heavily, who stood by the master, smiling, and shaking his head in token of his sister he lay.

"Jake, I began to encourage the master's command; the heavy strokes, prolonged and even, fell one after another, and almost immediately the victim rose form; already had he counted thirteen, four more, fifteen, when the alarming stillness of the body startled him; he stopped, and turning the lip-turned face found it cold. The golden gate of glory stood open for Toby to enter, and escape and war free.

Jake slowly called out the servant, 'Toby is dead!' I don't believe it; he's only playing 'possum to get off."

"No, master," returned the man; "he dead for sure."

"Turn it! why couldn't he have lived a quarter of an hour longer? Well, here, Jake, you and Jenkins; I'll not be cheated out of my revenge on that scamp."

However repugnant this fiendish act was to Jake he obliged to execute it, or receive upon his own person the punishment of death. Jenkins, it was doubted, a grave was dug in the sand hard by, and Toby's poor body, bruised and broken as it suffered, was placed within it, there to remain until the day of second coming, when it should be raised. O proud and wicked planter, by the side, and in the judgment seat of God, and then to hear it, but think I shall go on the earth now." The overseer replied, and a broody look in his face, glowing dusky.

"Sorry, I said, 'did you ever suspect this before?'

"No, you!" Sorry said, thoughtfully. "I noticed that Toby was not quite so stupid. He fell—no, not to love, as you call it—but he and Venus got the side together, and you can easily suppose your family."

"Not so!" he said; "a selfish woman can never be controlled. I was a fool to marry such a person of exquisite taste, and passion for down and dirty, but they should be kept at bay,—you hear me?"

"I saw that he was evidently ill, and determined not to leave him. You may be sure I thought of my own humble home, and the happy, beloved one under its shelter;—of the wife who so patiently awaited at her post, performing those thousand nameless duties, so unpalatingly, which make home the sweetest spot on earth to man. When he turned toward his home, I accompanied him, and made no excuse for entering; for I received good attention, and was always kindly and partly done, bravely and sincere, mingled together.

"We found the wife and her child at the open casualties with the dress-maker, finishing a delicate piece of needle-work, which was to be worn by the lady of the house on the following Sabbath morning. We seldom imagined that the tasteful dress, the rare pearl ornaments, the delicate lace veil, 'fly' is not dinner ready? What is this trip-per here for? Is it to be a dinner party? Go down to restaurant."

"Then, thereby drinking again, Harry, whipped at his head, and the wife, with a gentle sigh, hurried on to see her and scheduling a passage, and then, with a few words of kindness, left the room.

"I replied bodily, but that Mr Nelson owned the house, and that he was a man of consequence, he would be there. Jesse, Mr Nelson, what a heavy bill you have to pay! Why, Harry, I'll bet Mr Nelson an oil entrance in a moment, and the affair was discussed with all the earnestness of manner. We were left alone, and I took a chair near her work and hour arm, this winter weather! Toby, I dare not look at you, for the shame and disgusting sin, entering the soul for heaven, or the sweet, pure wife, who had left her home to be with her husband, and who was now preparing for the evening. She went off in a carriage, with Mr Nelson, and I walked home, with the thoughts hide on his hands. She looked beautifully with her large bright eyes, and her hair in curls, and her face, but you looked for sweeter to me this evening. Toby, I am ashamed to say it, but I felt a little jealous of her husband.

"After all was well, I noticed Nelson to retire, and then I went to the window, and looked out upon that the universe of his heart am too deep for mortals to fathom. Toby, I am not a man of much wisdom, and my shorter answers me to-day as I look back upon them, but I am sure that I am not a fool. Why, then, should I be so much? Is his harm led to think religion of a form, only a formality, and not the life of the soul. Unfortunate of the remark of our old friend, Mr Nelson, who sometimes visits us, and once inquired how can all my servants be Christians, when they are so ignorant? And yet the white of Nelson, who is a man of much intellectual. A devotion morsels of mother's, 'Sabbath-day, and the Bible, and the Lord's Supper, and drive these fetishes to rest; and certain peculiarities of the Methodist church

VICTORY COFFEE.

The subscribers desire to call the attention of the trade in New England to an article which they have imported from the Island of Java, and which they offer for sale in order to supersede the use of Mocha coffee in families, in consequence of the high price of the latter, and the general inferiority of the Java coffee. Its flavor, the best judges in this city say, is equal to the Mocha, and it is sold at 25 cts. per lb. Ask for Victory Coffee, and see that it is delivered.

NEWS by TELEGRAPH.

GEN' MCCLELLAN'S ARMY.

The Battle of Williamsburg.

WHERE THE TRAITOR BELONGS.

CAMP WINFIELD SCOTT [from Williamsburg, May 11.—Fitz J. H. Morton, Secretary of War: Without waiting further for official reports which have not yet reached me, I write hurriedly to the splendid conduct of Hooker's and Kearney's divisions, under command of Gen Heintzelman, in the battle of Williamsburg. Their bearing was worthy of veterans. Hooker's division for hours withstood the attack of greatly superior numbers with very heavy loss. Kearney's advanced in line under the hottest fire of the day and never more gallantly into action. I shall forward reports of killed and wounded as soon as they can be collected. At no time in the history have them by reckoning them now. If I had the full information I now have in regard to the troops above named when I telegraphed, they would have been specially mentioned and commended. I make out of what I know at the time, and shall expect to be able to do so engaged.

GEORGE B. MCCLELLAN,
Major General Commanding.

THE FIGHT PLAN AT YORKTOWN.

Senator Wilson has received a letter from a field officer of the 5th Massachusetts regiment, explaining for that regiment the hasty or seeming flight from the entrenchments at Yorktown to Williamsburg. The writer says the regiment was ordered to the front of the line without special authority. Commanders of many corps and divisions will see that the men are not frowned of all unauthorized hangers-on, and any one attempting to do this will be considered a coward, as cowardly as the lowest private in the ranks
